Chapter 2:

Once upon a time there was a country called Flatland. It was made up of many different people — different nationalities, different religions, even different economic levels. These professions were all treated equally under the philosophy that everyone works hard to get success at anything. This philosophy was very strong and was followed by every person in Richland. Thus each person tried, above all, to work hard and to work well.

But not everyone believed this. Some people with white skin and expensive clothes who were from the rich people always had the best jobs. Their leaders soon realized that higher economic status meant more power and success; came in, unions got poorer. With the rich people always having the best jobs and the workers always working hard, the unions thought that the rich people were hanging onto success and that the workers were losing their jobs. The leaders of the unions then decided to avoid trouble from the rich people; they were not afraid of the rich people because they were not afraid of the workers. As automobile manufacturers cut in their enormous profits, the workers and ex-workers jumped on the bandwagon and began to fight for more than Richland's money.

Those unions which had success came in, unions got money from the rich people. They recruited other workers into the unions, and offered higher wages and better working conditions. Some of the poorest people in Richland joined their unions and went on to fight for more than Richland's money.
